I've been playing Magic: The Gathering for over 20 years. It's been a huge part of my life, and it's had a profound impact on me, both positive and negative.

In the beginning, Magic was everything to me. I loved the game's complexity and strategy. I loved the feeling of competition, and I loved the sense of community I found among other players.

But over time, Magic became more than just a game to me. It became an addiction. I spent countless hours playing the game, and I neglected my other responsibilities. I lost touch with my friends and family, and I began to feel isolated and alone.

I knew that I had a problem, but I couldn't bring myself to stop playing. I was afraid of what would happen if I did. I was afraid of losing my friends, my community, and my sense of purpose.

But one day, I had a wake-up call. I realized that I was on the verge of losing everything. I had lost my job, my apartment, and my relationships. I was living on the streets, and I was desperate.

That's when I finally decided to get help. I went to therapy, and I started attending support groups. I learned about addiction, and I learned how to cope with it.

It wasn't easy, but I eventually got my life back on track. I got a new job, a new apartment, and I reconnected with my friends and family.

I still play Magic, but it's no longer an addiction. It's just a game, and I enjoy it for what it is.
